

AMBER BOCKIN

Associate

Being faced with medical malpractice litigation is unnerving to say the least. "I take great care in representing our clients. My main focus is to provide zealous service, protection, and communication to our clients during this process." Amber is recognized for her strong work ethic and attention to detail. Having worked in the medical litigation field for over seven years prior to pursuing her role as an associate, Amber understands how a case should be worked up on every level.

Amber's interest in law and medicine inspired her to enter the medical defense litigation field. "The practice of medicine is constantly changing, and health care professionals are at the forefront. To be able to work closely with these professionals is a true honor that I take very seriously."

Amber graduated from Regent University School of Law. During law school, Amber worked both as a legal assistant here at Hancock Daniel & Johnson, P.C., and as a consultant on various projects and policies of entrepreneurs and business owners.
